AFTERMATH: To better defend the marshaling yard, the Germans had established a formidable defensive line along the railways, anchored by the placement of rail cars four deep along the parallel lines, with many of the boxcars outfitted with machine guns. From within these rail cars, the Germans had established a base of fire that covered most of the avenues of approach into the yard with frontal, cross, and flanking fire opportunities. Attacking into this defense, 30th Rifle Corps was aided by the addition of 160 flamethrowers from 176th Independent Backpack Flamethrower Company and a Flamethrower Battalion from 53rd Army. Added to this destructive capability were a variety of heavy artillery and mortar units, which enabled the Soviets to secure the northern parts of the marshaling yard by the evening of 8 January. On the morning of 9 January, with 25th Guards Rifle Division supporting from the north, the main attack was led from the east, out of the Zugló area along the side streets perpendicular to the railyard (i.e., Miskolci utca and Rákospatak utca) by 659th Rifle Regiment of the 155th Rifle Division, with T-34/85 support from 3rd Tank Brigade, 23rd Tank Corps. Distinguishing themselves during the attack (according to the 30th Rifle Corps War Diary) were the regimental mortar assets led by Senior-Lieutenant Berezhnyi, which were recognized for destroying 25 Axis troops and two enemy mortars. By the end of the day, the two-pronged Soviet attack succeeded in capturing the railway station and clearing the surrounding southern portions of the marshaling yard, forcing Panzergrenadier-Regiment 93 from its heavily entrenched positions. As always, though, the Soviets knew that the inevitable German counterattack was just over the horizon.
